Personality and Society

Human society has advanced considerably; there are certain traits that can make you stand out while there can also be certain traits that would weaken your image in society. For example, some positive traits like being outgoing, socially inclined, and extrovert can make you stand out far more than somebody with negative traits such as being introverted, overly solemn, and socially anxious.

I consider myself an extrovert since I love being social and making new friends regularly. I love politics, culture, and traditions which contribute to my personality. I am hardly ever happy being alone for extended periods of time. I'd rather be outside and socialise.

As for my upcoming career in IT I personally think that being an extrovert is a huge benefit to the job itself as it would make cooperation and general teamwork much more effective. Also being patient and taking in other's perspectives is a must in IT. Last thing you want to do is lose your temper and risk turning the entire project into disarray.

Schools usually encourage students to be creative, disciplined, and generally themselves. There are no specific traits required to pass school, you can do it as an extrovert, introvert or even lazily.

People can certainly change whether in terms of their personality, behaviour or appearance. The most basic type of personality can and usually will change over the years growing up.
